Microsoft was found, in the narrow scope of the way-too long trial, to be guilty of serious violations of law. It is my opinion that if Microsoft is let off, it will continue to do, as it has shown before that it will do, what it was found guilty of doing. What purpose does it serve to let Microsoft off? None to the consumer, that's for sure, and everything to Microsoft.

Which, exactly, was found guilty? Microsoft for being an illegal monopoly, or the DOJ for taking this (very narrow case) to trial? Punishment is what is required, not a pat on the back and a wink of the eye.

Sincerely,

Cornel Huth
